4. The Greenbrier

White Sulphur Springs, West Virginia

In 1946, "America's Resort," open since 1778, got a makeover from pioneering interior designer Dorothy Draper, who also designed its famously palatial indoor pool.

Draper's love of color and bold prints—including an enthusiastic embrace of stripes and chintz—is evident at

The Greenbrier to this day. Book a resort room or spacious suite, a cottage, or even an estate home. Outdoors, reserve your tee time or court time, or take advantage of the mountain scenery for more activities than you can shake a (hiking) stick at: SUP and kayak adventures; whitewater rafting; fishing, hiking, and climbing; Jeep driving, biking, and horseback riding. Note: The Greenbrier is all about old-school elegance, so there's a dress code. Fellas, leave your baseball caps at home.
